Introduction=

IN planning this series on Currier & Ives prints, the titles decided upon were selected in the order of their popularity, historic interest and value. "Clipper Ship Prints" won the decision for first place without very much competition, and the second place must necessarily go to Railroads, Indians and the West. In fact the combination of these three subjects in one volume will probably interest more people than did the Clipper Ships. There are but few large collections of Railroad prints in this country, and they are very complete and quite valuable. The Indian and Western prints claim many more collectors and the value of these prints has been rising steadily in recent years. Several fine collections containing many Indian and Western prints have been offered at auction, but the Railroad prints seldom appear at these sales.

Nathaniel Currier was a Pioneer. It was he who first catered to the public by placing before them these colored pictorial records of current events. He lived and worked in a stirring age: the Great West was being opened up to the Pioneer settlers; the Railroads were pushing Eastward and Westward to complete the line from coast to coast; political competition and strife was the order of the day; and the Civil War was a tragedy which left but few of our citizens untouched. In picturing these important historic events, Currier left to posterity a graphic record which in many instances is the only record available today.

Many super-critical art experts have been harsh in their criticism of these prints. Much of this criticism is perhaps warranted, but when their historical importance is considered, and the fact that these workers on stone did not pose as artists but chroniclers, it seems unfair. Our present day caricaturists and cartoonists, with all the knowledge and facilities at their disposal, many times fail to embody in their work, that feeling and understanding that Nathaniel Currier displayed in his prints.

The American Pioneers were legion—some are recorded for their deeds of valor and accomplishment, but the majority are today unknown and their names remain unsung in the annals of our history. The Great West realizes that they owe their existence to these Pioneers, the large cities have erected statues and monuments commemorating the heroic deeds and epoch-making events, and books and pamphlets have been published to broadcast the fame of these known and unknown heroes.

The struggle for existence and civilization on the frontiers was stirringly described by those who wrote or returned east, and the encounters with the Indians, the hazards and privations of the trial, were so filled with romantic interest, that Currier was quick to grasp the possibilities which this situation offered—to publish his pictorial records.

RAILROADS

THE first Railroad in the United States which was constructed for the purpose of carrying passengers and freight was the Baltimore & Ohio, which received its charter in 1827 and began laying rails on July 4th, 1828. The first section of thirteen miles was opened in May 1830. This was operated by means of a horse treadmill on a flatcar. The first railroad constructed for steam in this country was the Charleston & Hamburg, chartered in 1829, and it was on this road that the first locomotive accident in the country occurred. The negro engineer, disliking the sound of steam escaping from the safety valve, sat on the valve and the boiler exploded. This intimidated prospective passengers, and to calm their fears a flat car loaded with cotton bales was placed immediately behind the engine, and between this and the passenger coaches was another flat car occupied by a negro brass band.

The earliest railroad ventures in America were sponsored by such men as Philip Evan Thomas, Jeremiah Pierson, Eleazer Lord, Asa Whitney, Cornelius Vanderbilt, etc., but the first suggestion of a coast-to-coast railway system was made by Judge S. W. Dexter, a publisher, of Ann Arbor, Michigan, in an editorial article on Feb. 6th, 1832. Construction of the Pacific Railroad, which was to join the East and West, was not started until after the Civil War, and the task was allotted to the Union Pacific, which was to build Westward, and the Central Pacific which would build Eastward. Great were the difficulties of each, the Union having to contend with constant Indian attacks, and the Central had the serious difficulty of crossing the Sierras. As the work progressed from day to day a temporary town was erected at the end of the line, known as "Hell on Wheels," and military discipline prevailed.

There was great rivalry between the contesting Roads and as they neared the completion of their tasks, the location of the junction of the two roads was a subject of national controversy. It was finally settled by the railroad executives themselves and on May 10th, 1869 the last spike was driven, at Promontory Point, Utah, joining the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts with a continuous rail connection. Great celebrations were held all oved the United States. The importance to the country of this railroad cannot be over estimated. It made possible the settlement of regions heretofore unavailable, and materially assisted in spreading one political power from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

After the early pioneering stage of American railroads, many capitalists and promoters became interested in this field, and this fact speeded up construction. Such men as Leland Stanford, Thomas C. Durant, Oakes Ames, Collis P. Huntington, James J. Hill, etc. used their wealth and brains in furthering construction and mergers. The swiftness of railroad expansion in the United States was one of the outstanding marvels of the 19th Century.

To establish the identity of every train or locomotive pictured by Currier & Ives is practically impossible, and this fact has been the source of controversy among collectors for years. It has been established, however, that every railroad print of Currier (excepting the comics) represents some particular train at some particular point. Gradually each print is being identified through research with the aid of old bank notes, daguerreotypes, and old wood cuts.

American "Express" Train (No. 64) has been identified as the New York Central Railroad from an early New York Central poster of 1853 which is in the possession of the American Antiquarian Society of Worcester, Mass.

Across the Continent (No. 65) is one of the most important of the group. This shows what is undoubtedly the first trans-continental train. The date of this print is 1868, and as the road was not completed until May, 1869, it is certain that Currier was anxiously watching the completion of this work, and had his print all ready and copyrighted before the actual event took place. This no doubt accounts for the fact that the exact location pictured in this print cannot be identified, inasmuch as the junction point had not been decided upon until after the print was made.

American Railroad Scene. Snow Bound (No. 67) was identified twenty years ago by one of the Hill family. The figure resting on his shovel is James J. Hill, and the event took place on the Great Northern Railroad.

The Express Train (No. 68) was redrawn from an old wood-cut of a scene on the Boston & Albany Railroad at Greenbush (East Albany) N. Y. in 1842.

The Danger Signal (No. 69). This locomotive was named after James R. Pitcher, Secretary of the United States Mutual Accident Ass'n. and the figure of the engineer shown in the cab, was taken from a likeness of Mr. Pitcher. I knew him well for many years and in addition to being a great insurance man, he was an avid print collector.

The Express Train (No. 71) was copied direct from an engraving on an original bank note of the Bank of Port Jervis, N. Y. The train is on the New York & Erie Rrailroad.

This is the earliest railroad print done by Currier, and it will be noted that the locomotive carries no headlight. The first American railroads ran only in the day time, but with the increasing demand for passenger traffic, freight had to be hauled at night. The first railroad headlight consisted of a flat car pushed ahead of the locomotive, on which was a pile of sand with a fire of burning pine knots. Next candles were used, being improved by a reflector about 1840. With the discovery of petroleum in 1859 came the kerosene lamp, which was a great improvement over the candle as a railroad headlight. After this came the gas lamp supplied from storage tanks, and finally the electric head light. It is interesting to note the various types of headlight as shown in these prints. Nos. 64, 68, 70, 78, are undoubtedly candle headlights, while Nos. 66, 67, 72, 73, 75, 77, 80, 82, 84, 86 would, from the date of their publication, appear to be kerosene lights.

The Express Train (No. 72) is a scene in the cut outside of Jersey City on the Erie Railroad.

The "Lightning Express" Trains. Leaving the Junction (No. 78). The location of this junction has not definitely been identified, but the trains bear the shield of the United States Government on front and must represent the locomotives taken over by the government during the war. This same subject was used by R. Rogerson in 1872, published in England for the Fourth Annual Yorkshire Fine Art Distribution.

Night Scene at an American Railway Junction (No. 80). This scene has been attributed to the early railroad yards of the New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad, either at Boston or New Haven. The "Owl" train is still one of the best known daily trains from New York to Boston.

The comics and caricatures are extremely interesting and help to form an idea of the conditions of early railroading in this country.

INDIANS

WHILE the railroad, with its construction difficulties and political importance, was a subject of great public interest of the day, the romance of the American Indians, their modes of life and warfare, and their attempted barrier to the westward march of civilization, aroused in the mind of the public a keen interest which made Currier's colored prints much sought for. George Catlin, an artist, spent much of his time in the Indian country, studying their habits and filling his sketch book with invaluable material, from which he completed and published in England, his book on the American Indian. Currier & Ives lithographed many of Catlin's subjects, giving credit to the artist in each case, but whether permission was received from the publishers or from the artist's representatives, cannot be ascertained. The Currier & Ives prints appeared about 1865 and they were at first accused of using the English stones with their own imprint, but this has since been disproven. A close comparison of the Currier with the Catlin prints will disclose the fact that there are slight variations. Nos. 109 to 125 comprise the Catlin subjects done by Currier & Ives. They are extremely decorative, historically important, and are becoming more and more difficult to find. They have been neglected by collectors for years, but are now being appreciated and consequently rising in value.

The paintings of Arthur F. Tait are conceded to be the most virile representations of Indian life of that day. Nos. 126 to 137 were practically all painted by Tait and the drawings on stone done by Louis Maurer. Neither Tait nor Maurer had ever been West at this time, to actually see the events which they so graphically portrayed, and yet the records they left are taken today as historical facts. Their information undoubtedly came first hand from returned pioneers, and their artistic ability and romantic imagination did the rest. The coloring in these prints is usually of the finest quality and it is evident that Currier & Ives gave them more than the usual attention. It is rather strange that there are not more copies of these prints available today, as these subjects were so popular in their day that the distribution must have been great. The fact is, however, that they are scarce today, and a fine copy will bring a constantly increasing price.

PIONEERS AND THE WEST

THIS series of prints records the hardships which confronted the early settlers, their modes of travel and life, the conditions under which they wrested from this virgin country a home for themselves and families, and typical scenes of that part of the country.

The outstanding print of this series is No. 157, The Rocky Mountains. Emigrants Crossing the Plains. This is popularly known as the "Covered Wagon" print, and depicts an Emigrant wagon train, drawn by oxen. This was the slowest possible method of travel, but due to the hardships attendant upon such a journey, and the necessity of relying upon their beasts for the completion and success of the trip, oxen were chosen in preference to horses. This print and No. 145, A Halt by the Wayside, admirably record the methods by which our ancestors migrated west.

Nos. 138, 139, 140, 142, 147, 150, 154, 161, are scenes of typical pioneer homes of the period, and are interesting as records of the various types of homes built under varying conditions. The California series (Nos. 163 to 172) are beautiful scenes of a part of our country which was quite foreign to the Eastern citizen.

In compiling a work of this nature, one must necessarily call upon others for assistance, and it is with sincere thanks that I hereby acknowledge the kindness of Mr. C. L. Winey and General William Barclay Parsons in placing at my disposal their collections of railroad prints and data, without which this record would not have been possible. The record herein of the Indian prints is the most complete ever assembled, and is due to the kindness of Mr. Francis P. Garvan and Mr. Russell W. Thorpe in allowing me access to their collection.
